~~Michael Pluder, Kenneth R. Westphal: How Hume and Kant ...~~

Kant agrees with Hume that the idea of necessary connection is in fact an essential ingredient in our idea of the relation between cause and effect; Kant agrees, in addition, that, if all we had to go on were a purely inductive inference from observed constant conjunctions, the inference from comparative to strict universality would not be legitimate, and the presumed necessary connection arising in this way (i.e., from custom) would be merely subjective.

In more modern times, thinkers like Hume and Kant recognized those elements in laws of human nature, while remaining agnostic about their provenance. Hence: natural law morality sans metaphysics and teleology. The heart of this book is a presentation of Kant's natural law constructivism, particularly as developed by Onora O'Neill.
