The United States made a "sort of" pledge to consider supplying submarine technology to Taiwan. Most likely, the US is thinking of helping Taiwan with a combat system, probably the one produced by Lockheed (AN/BYG-1 Combat System) that was also used in the Collins -class submarines built by Australia. While a modern up-to-date combat system would be a positive development, there are other ...

~~New Thinking about the Taiwan Issue | Taylor & Francis Group~~

The China-Taiwan relationship was one of the most fractious in East Asia during the first decade of the 2000s. Many fretted about the high level of cross-Strait tension, especially given the involvement of other players such as the US and Japan. Indeed, some raised the specter of war between Beijing and Taipei, which might lead the People's Republic of China (PRC) and the US into a ...

~~The New Arms Sale to Taiwan and U.S. Policy Toward the DPP~~

Taiwan is planning to build new diesel-electric submarines, but progress on that is minimal to non-existent. The country lacks just about everything to make that happen: it does not have the special metals needed for the hull; it does not have its own optimized combat system; it does not manufacture torpedoes and it does not have ultra-quiet diesel engines like the German MTU engines supplied ...

~~Experts' Analyses—Why The Taiwan Issue Is So Dangerous ...~~

By choosing to announce the sale just before the election, the Obama administration seems to be signaling China that it will not countenance any Chinese interference in the Taiwanese electoral process, and also — and even more important — that Taiwan’s prospective new DPP government is, in American eyes, entirely legitimate, falling squarely under the vaguely defined U.S. security ...

Taiwan had observer status from 2009 until 2016, when China blocked further participation after Tsai became president. Such solidarities come at a time when China’s standing in the international community is under scrutiny due to tensions in Hong Kong, the US-China trade war and most recently the pandemic, which has fanned anti-Chinese sentiment.
