Surely it is only my duty not to kill because death is bad. So I should prevent more deaths. What makes a will good is that it wills good ends. Kant's response, of course, is that there are no ends that are good without qualification. So this cannot be the right analysis of the good will. But the disagreement goes deeper.

"The only thing that matters morally regarding our actions is whether we act out of a sense of duty, that is, whether the will follows the dictates of reason. We may be particularly disinclined to act in accordance with our duty, but the important point is whether reason compels the will to comply with duty."

This is not the proper place to discuss Kant's brief, late and notorious essay on the right to lie, in which he claims that lying to a would-be murderer about the whereabouts of his victim is a violation of the right of humanity (RML 8:425-430). For this is not only not about a duty to oneself, but is even about a duty of right rather than ...

Indeed, we respect these laws to the degree, but only to the degree, that they do not violate values, laws or principles we hold more dear. Yet Kant thinks that, in acting from duty, we are not at all motivated by a prospective outcome or some other extrinsic feature of our conduct except insofar as these are requirements of duty itself.
