Dead The Many Lives Of Americas

Street is a non-fiction book by Ada Calhoun about the history of St. Mark's Place, a three-block stretch of East Village, Manhattan. Calhoun, who grew up on the street, shows how disillusioned bohemians of every era have declared "St. Marks Is Dead" when their era on the street passed.

“Calhoun, who grew up on St. Mark’s Place, is careful not to romanticize any one era of the East Village (which serves as a suitable proxy for much of New York City during the past century). St. Marks Is Dead is an ecstatic roll call.”

Procession of the Dead. Though the particulars of the ritual varied from town to town, legend has it that the day before the feast of St. Mark gives people a chance to see the ghosts of those who are destined to die in the coming year. In most descriptions, a person need only be outside their church from 11 p.m. to 1 a.m.
