Thus debt as an institution is morally ambivalent. Clearly there is a good, mutually beneficial set of debt-related practices. But we cannot insist on an absolute obligation to pay debts, without considering the quality and effects of all debt-related activity in society at large. Douglas goes on to an apparent digression on money.

You're obviously in control of the thing. Any discussion we have is more philosophy than it is actual math in your case. But conceptually, here's the problem. There are a couple of things. Number one, I don't do any business with American Express because we have had to work with them, and they're scum in how they treat their customers.
