This approach is a collaborative between the client and counsellor and the work is mostly done with the client being in control of the therapy. In conclusion, I understand the core conditions are vital in all approaches to counselling - they are only a necessity in the humanistic approach, but they are sufficient in the other two approaches.

The bottom line... be proud of being a person-centred practitioner and all the evidence behind our approach. But be informed as well (see here for a good overview of all the evidence). There's every reason to challenge someone who belittles the evidence base for person-centred therapy, but you need to know your research and what it all means.

What is person-centred care and why is it important?
